SIR,

Your most humble Servant.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

'I Am a Country Gentleman, of a good plentiful 'Estate, and live as the rest of my Neigh'bours with great Hospitality. I have been ever 'reckoned among the Ladies the best Company in 'the World, and have Access as a sort of Favou'rite. If I never came in publick, but I saluted them 'tho' in great Assemblies all around, where it was 'seen how genteely I avoided hampering my Spurs 'in their Petticoats, while I moved amongst them; 'and on the other Side, how prettily they sati'fied and receiv'd me, standing in proper Rows 'and advancing as fast as they saw their Elders or 'their Betters dispatched by me. But so it is, Mr. 'SPECTATOR, that all our good Breeding is of late 'lost by the unhappy Arrival of a Courtier, or 'Town-Gentleman, who came lately among us. 'This Person wherever he came into a Room, made 'a profound Bow and fell back, then recovered 'with a soft Air and made a Bow to the next, and 'so to one or two more, and then took the Gross 'of the Room, by passing by them in a continued 'Bow till he arriv'd at the Person he thought 'proper particularly to entertain. This he did with 'so good a Grace and Assurance, that it is taken 'for the present Fashion; and there is no young 'Gentlewoman within several Miles of this Place 'has been kissed ever since his first Appearance a'mong us. We Country Gentlemen cannot begin 'again and learn these fine and reserved Airs; and 'our Conversation is at a Stand, till we have your 'Judgment for or against Kissing, by Way of Ci'vility or Salutation, which is impatiently ex'pected by your Friends of both Sexes, but by 'none so much as

Your humble Servant,
Ruttick Sprightly.

Mr. SPECTATOR, December 3d, 1711.

'I Was the other Night at Philaster, where I ex'pected to hear your famous Trunk-maker, 'but was unhappily disappointed of his Company; 'and saw another Person who had the like Ambi'tion to distinguish himself in a manly Manner, 'partly by Vociferation or talking loud, and partly 'by his bodily Agility. This was a very lusty 'Fellow, but withal a sort of Beau, who getting 'into one of the Side-Boxes on the Stage before 'the Curtain drew, was disposed to shew the whole 'Audience his Activity by leaping over the Spikes; 'he pass'd from thence to one of the entring Doors, 'where he took Snuff with a tolerable good Grace, 'display'd his fine Cloaths, made two or three 'feint Passes at the Curtain with his Cane, then 'faced about and appear'd at t'other Door: Here

'he

he affected to survey the whole House, bow'd and smil'd at Random, and then shew'd his Teeth (which were some of them indeed very white): After this he retir'd behind the Curtain, and obliged us with several Views of his Person from every Opening.

'During the Time of acting he appear'd frequently in the Prince's Apartment, made one at the Hunting-Match, and was very forward in the Rebellion. If there were no Injunctions to the contrary, yet this Practice must be confess'd to diminish the Pleasure of the Audience, and for that Reason presumptuous and unwarrantable; but since her Majesty's late Command has made it criminal, you have Authority to take Notice of it.

SIR,

Your humble Servant,
